What's in Your Pocket?

by Rich Bottles Jr.

Do you have the storecard of a pedophile in your collection?

... No, this isn't an article about Walter Breen.

This is about an FBI bulletin sent out to law enforcement agencies last year. The Ann Arbor Michigan Police Department posted the bulletin on its website, even though the document was marked as Law Enforcement Sensitive (you can check out the posting at <http://www.ci.ann-arbor.mi.us/SafetyServices/Police/3-14-07.pdf>).

What the bulletin basically says is: if your kid comes home and tells you that a stranger gave him a quarter, then you'd better look at the coin for any unusual markings.

Pedophiles apparently like to pretend that they're part of a secret society, like the Odd Fellows. But while they're definitely odd, the real reason for their secrecy is because society generally frowns upon adults raping children.

Consequently, to help them identify fellow perverts, some pedophiles have developed "secret" symbols, which they proudly display on their jewelry, correspondence and other possessions. The symbols include the so-called, gender-specific, BL logo and GL logo. The blue BL logo is one continuous line forming two triangles (a small triangle inside of a large triangle). The pink GL logo is similar, but the single-line drawing forms two interlocking hearts.

Thanks to the FBI, the innocuous pedophile logos are now familiar to all law enforcement agencies and the police will be looking out for the BL and GL logos the next time they question the neighborhood weirdoes as they creep around the local playgrounds.

What's all this have to do with numismatics, you ask? Well, if you're one of those hobbyists who collect because it's "fun to hold a coin in your hand and imagine where it's been," then you may want to quit reading this so that you can go on enjoying your hobby and your vivid imagination.

Because, strangely enough, the pedophiles have begun promoting their sickness by counterstamping the BL and GL logos on coins (specifically only Washington quarters have been found with the symbols so far). And that's not all, the reverse of the coins have a circular countermark with the following words inside: KIDS / LOVE / PEDOS.

So, you'd better check your maverick counterstamps, because you may unknowingly own the storecard of a degenerate.

Geocoins on the move in the 21st Century

Have you ever used a Global Positioning System (GPS Device), like Garmin or TomTom, in your car to help you find a coin show or flea market? Well, some people use these devices to find just one special coin or medal, usually hidden out in the woods somewhere.

Anyone searching for exonumia on an Internet auction site has come across these special coins or medals, which are called "Geocoins," in their unregistered state. Online, these Geocoins represent additional unwanted material that a collector has to sift through.

- A title search on eBay in October for "Geocoin" generated 844 auction results and that doesn't account for variations in spelling or instances where the word is in the text of the auction description but not in the title. -

Geocoins have been around a couple of years, but their popularity has pretty much remained with the so-called "Geocaching" community, even though the coins resemble medals and sometimes have themes that might appeal to exonumists. What may not appeal to numismatists is how these coins are actually used.

After all, numismatists may be willing to drive hundreds of miles to a coin show, where they may not find anything they want; but they may not be willing to tramp around in a forest with a GPS device in pursuit of a particular Geocoin, which they aren't even supposed to keep.

Consider the hobby of Geocaching, which is pronounced gee-oh-cashing, any item can be placed in a cache and hidden somewhere, but Geocoins are especially popular because they have a unique serial number embossed on the coin which allows it to be tracked.

What happens in Geocaching is that a hobbyist will obtain a Geocoin, either having their own coin designed & minted or buying a stock design from a dealer, and will then find someplace in the world to hide it.

Once a suitable hiding place is found, the Geocacher will use his/her GPS device to determine the coordinates of the hiding place. He'll then register the coin, using its serial number, and the coordinates on a website such as www.geocaching.com.

At this point, another Geocacher will check the website to see if there are any new caches hidden in his proximity. Once he finds a registered cache that he's interested in finding, he'll record the Geocoin's registration number and the coordinates, then head out to locate it. The challenge apparently lies in the fact that a GPS device can lead you to within 30 to 100 feet of a cache, but some serious searching of the area must then take place in order to find the hidden Geocoin (the coin can't be placed out in the open because it might be picked up by a curious passerby).

After a Geocoin is found, it is customary for the finder to report its discovery on the host website. The finder should then take the Geocoin back out into the world and locate a new hiding place, preferably somewhere significantly different than the previous hiding place(s). By doing this, hobbyists can track the movements of one particular Geocoin in same way that some people track the circulation of specific dollar bills on www.wheresgeorge.com.

The Geocaching community doesn't care if the occasional unregistered Geocoin is purchased on eBay and added to a collection, but it may not encourage exonumists to get too involved in searching for registered Geocoins using GPS devices, because the discovered Geocoins may not make it to a new hiding place once a collector finds them.
